Some words sometimes share the same definition but look different, leading some people to get confused. This is the case with the terms acclimate, acclimatise, and acclimatize. This post will try to shine a light on how these words so you can use them appropriately.

While they have different spellings, acclimate, acclimatise, and acclimatize mean the same thing. These three words are most commonly used as a verb meaning “to become accustomed to a new climate or to new conditions.”

The main difference between these three words is their origin and country of usage. The terms acclimate and acclimatize are used primarily in American English but acclimate is found to be the older word. On the other hand, the word acclimatise is the preferred term in British and Australian English.

They may also function as a verb which means “to respond physiologically or behaviorally to changes in a complex of environmental factors.”
Acclimate vs. Acclimatise vs. Acclimatize

Usually the body is said to acclimatize to the change in altitude within two to three days.

satPRnews

“We were a few thousand metres above sea level and my body just wasn’t acclimatising and adjusting to the change.”

NEWS.com.au

Remember that choosing which of these three terms to use depends on your audience, setting, and/or style guide if applicable.